Maria Soto-Greene, MD, MS-HPEd, is Professor and Vice Dean at Rutgers New Jersey Medical School (NJMS). She has amassed more than 30 years of experience in all aspects of medical education. Initially, Dr. Soto-Greene focused on the care of the critically ill patient, honing in on the significance of physician/patient communication and its impact on vulnerable patients and their loved ones. These experiences, combined with her own life in a family that was uninsured and economically disadvantaged, influenced her to champion initiatives for individuals from similar backgrounds. Dr. Soto-Greene is committed to advancing the school’s cultural competency education with the goal of attaining health equity. She has been continuously funded by federal and private agencies since the early 1990s and has passionately worked to create unequaled opportunity for thousands of Hispanic and other individuals under-represented in medicine and science. These programs support individuals beginning at the pre-college level through medical school faculty, contributing to career advancement and cultivating the next generation of champions for social justice. Equally important, she has been a leader in disseminating best practices to other medical schools. Dr. Soto-Greene earned her medical degree from New Jersey Medical School, completed her internal medicine training at University Hospital and earned her master's degree in Health Professions Education at the MGH Institute of Health Professions.
